Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi vowed Wednesday that "no intimidation" would deter Italian forces from their mission in southern Iraq, rejectin home following a suicide attack that killed at least 18 Italians and 11 Iraqis.

Italians were shocked and disbelieving as they heard reports throughout the day of the rising death toll in the southern city of Nasiriyah, the sc on their troops anywhere since World War II. Italian news media had consistently reported that the troops were winning the trust of the local po

Flags were lowered to half-staff across Italy, and lawmakers observed a moment of silence at Parliament for the victims: 12 members of the pa as the carabinieri, four soldiers and two civilians. People placed flowers in front of carabinieri headquarters in Rome. And members of an Italian respect before a match with a Polish team in Warsaw.

President Carlo Ciampi, about to take off for a previously scheduled week's trip to the United States, called the attack "an ignoble act of terrori vehemently opposed the war in Iraq, condemned the "vile attack," which he said in a message to Ciampi "won't help the pacification or recover

The deaths brought serious political pressure to bear on Berlusconi, who has closely supported the United States in Iraq despite widespread p forces did not take part in the invasion but were quickly dispatched to help secure the country after the capture of Baghdad.

Addressing a special session of the Senate, Berlusconi called on Italians of all political beliefs to unite in condolence for the victims and in det supporting the approximately 2,300 Italian troops who are in Iraq on what the government calls a humanitarian mission.

"No intimidation must deter us from the will to help this country to lift itself up and build a government and a situation of security and freedom,"

In an apparent effort to head off attacks by the opposition, Berlusconi declared: "If there is a day when polemics must cease, this is it, this is t of loyalty and democratic maturity regarding those who have lost their lives."
